

THE 100TH REGRESSION OF THE DUAL ECLIPSE

- VOLUME 1 -

- AUTHOR -

That's Someone Who Can't Write Novel

CHAPTER 1

THE LAST BREATH

The sky looked like a canvas of slow-fading fire. The sun, appearing as a heavy disc of molten gold, was sinking below the horizon, bleeding deep amber and crimson tones into the atmosphere. The sharp blue of the afternoon had vanished, replaced by moody purples and dusty pinks that stretched across the sky. The clouds above caught this final, low-angled light from beneath, their edges glowing like dying embers in a hearth.

On the ground, the sharp edges of the world were blurring; below, the shadows in the streets stretched incredibly long before dissolving into deep, solid silhouettes. A coolness slipped into the air, bringing with it the heavy, quiet stillness of a world winding down.

On the rooftop, two old friends—who had now witnessed 80 to 89 years of life—sat close together on a traditional woven cot, their eyes fixed on the exact same spot in the heavens. The fading light caught the deep wrinkles on their faces, gilding them in a golden warmth, as if the collective experiences of their long lives were shining through that final sunbeam. Neither spoke; they no longer needed words to communicate. They simply sat in absolute silence, shoulder to shoulder, watching the day fade just as they had done for so many years.

And the exact moment the sun's very last ray slipped completely behind the horizon, the remaining crimson in the sky began to turn cold. A strange, profound, and beautifully serene stillness settled between them.

They remained seated there on the roof, side by side, their gazes still directed toward the darkening sky where the sun had just set. But all movement had left their bodies. Their breathing—which had been a part of this world for nearly nine decades—stopped perfectly in sync, in the exact same heartbeat. Both took one final, deep breath together, and just as the day drew its last breath, their souls quietly departed this old life at the very same instant.

There was no pain or grief left on their faces; instead, there was only an absolute peace—the kind of serenity that belongs only to those who complete the long journey of life together.